Why Support CBCF

“The research directions made possible by the CBCF has enabled us to make significant progress toward understanding breast cancer more deeply than ever before and attacking it in novel, highly promising ways. Our work is based on the observation – first hypothesized in 2005 and now widely confirmed – that cancer is rooted as much in the ability of cancer cells to migrate as in their ability to produce progeny by cell division, also called mitosis. Migratory cancer seed cells are now known to be stem-like cells in that they cannot only migrate but also divide continuously, leading to tumor masses, called metastases.”

“We are grateful for the support of the CBCF in helping make these advances a reality. Together we are making strides toward the understanding and the control of cancers of the breast and indeed all cancers. It is realistic to look forward to the day when cancers may not only be cured but may be prevented, achievements rooted in the type of science now made possible by CBCF funding.”
